A lawyer by training, Martin Espada is currently Professor of English at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, where he teaches courses on Pablo Neruda and on poetry of the Americas. Espada has authored six volumes of verse and a collection of essays, Zapata’s Disciple. He has also edited two major anthologies of poetry, El Coro: A Chorus of Latino and Latina Poets, and Poetry Like Bread: Poets of the Political Imagination. His most recent book of poems is entitled A Mayan Astronomer in Hell’s Kitchen. The first of the two poems reprinted here is taken from this collection. The second is the title-poem of Espada’s 1996 book Imagine the Angels of Bread. We thank Professor Espada for permission to reprint these poems.

Author’s Note: Mumia Abu-Jamal is a radical African-American journalist on death row, convicted in the 1981 slaying of a police officer in Philadelphia—under extremely dubious circumstances. There is a movement to win him a new trial.

In April 1997, NPR’s All Things Considered first commissioned, then refused to air, the following poem, due to its subject matter and political sympathies.

Another Nameless Prostitute Says the Man is Innocent
—for Mumia Abu-Jamal

The board-blinded windows knew what happened; the pavement sleepers of Philadelphia, groaning in their ghost-infested sleep, knew what happened; every Black man blessed with the gashed eyebrow of nightsticks knew what happened; even Walt Whitman knew what happened, poet a century dead, keeping vigil from the tomb on the other side of the bridge.

More than fifteen years ago, the cataract stare of the cruiser’s headlights, the impossible angle of the bullet, the tributaries and lakes of blood, Officer Faulkner dead, suspect Mumia shot in the chest, the witnesses who saw a gunman running away, his heart and feet thudding.
The nameless prostitutes know, hunched at the curb, their bare legs chilled.
Their faces squinted to see that night, rouged with fading bruises. Now the faces fade.
Perhaps an eyewitness putrifies eyes open in a bed of soil, or floats in the warm gulf stream of her addiction, or hides from the fanged whispers of the police in the tomb of Walt Whitman,
where the granite door is open
and fugitive slaves may rest.

Mumia: the Panther beret, the thinking dreadlocks, dissident words that swarmed the microphone like a hive.
sharing meals with people named Africa, calling out their names even after the police bombardment that charred their Black bodies.
So the governor has signed the death warrant.
The executioner's needle would flush the poison down into Mumia's writing hand so the fingers curl like a burned spider;
his calm questioning mouth would grow numb,
and everywhere radios sputter to silence, in his memory.

The veiled prostitutes are gone,
gone to the segregated balcony of whores.
But the newspaper reports that another nameless prostitute says the man is innocent, that she will testify at the next hearing.
Beyond the courthouse, a multitude of witnesses chants, prays, shouts for his prison to collapse, a shack in a hurricane.

Mumia, if the last nameless prostitute becomes an unraveling turban of steam, if the judges'robes become clouds of ink swirling like octopus deception.
if the shroud becomes your Amish quilt,
if your dreadlocks are snipped during autopsy.
then drift above the ruined RCA factory that once birthed radios
to the tomb of Walt Whitman,
where the granite door is open
and fugitive slaves may rest.
